Overview

In this document we share the proposed user experience solutions after examining the 'Foundations of Academic Journaling' course. The solutions cover the landing page and issues relating to navigation, architecture, access requirements as well as client requirements.

Current Course Landing Page

What was retained from the initial design:

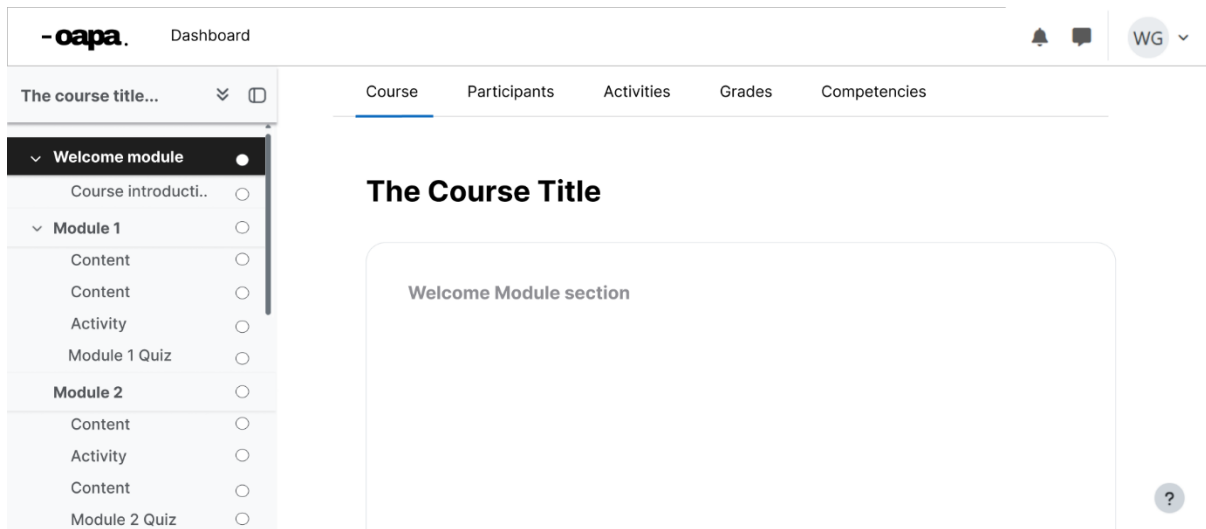

The structure and layout: the user lands under the course tab where the structure is a left side navigation panel which takes a bit less than quarter of the page, split with the main content page.

Left navigation panel: this panel structures the course modules and content and helps the user navigate through them. The colour of the left side navigation panel is the same.

The naming for the secondary navigation tabs: the naming of the tabs is the same and the overall design of it as well.

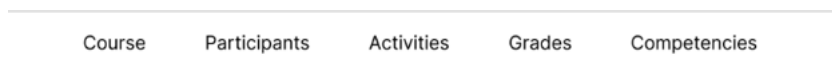

The main content area

Proposed Course Landing Page

The changes from the initial landing page:

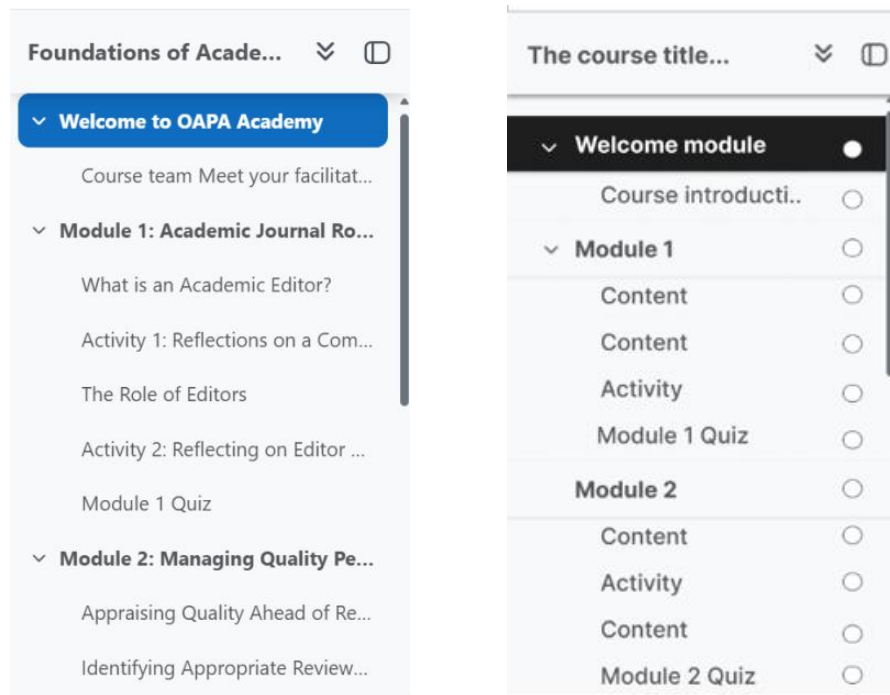

Secondary navigation panel: the secondary navigation panel was moved to the top of the page. It will be visible when the user lands on the page, and whenever the user scrolls up. When the user scrolls through the content the navigation tab will roll up to give the user more content space. This solves the issue of the navigation disappearing especially to the other tabs once the user is going through the modules.

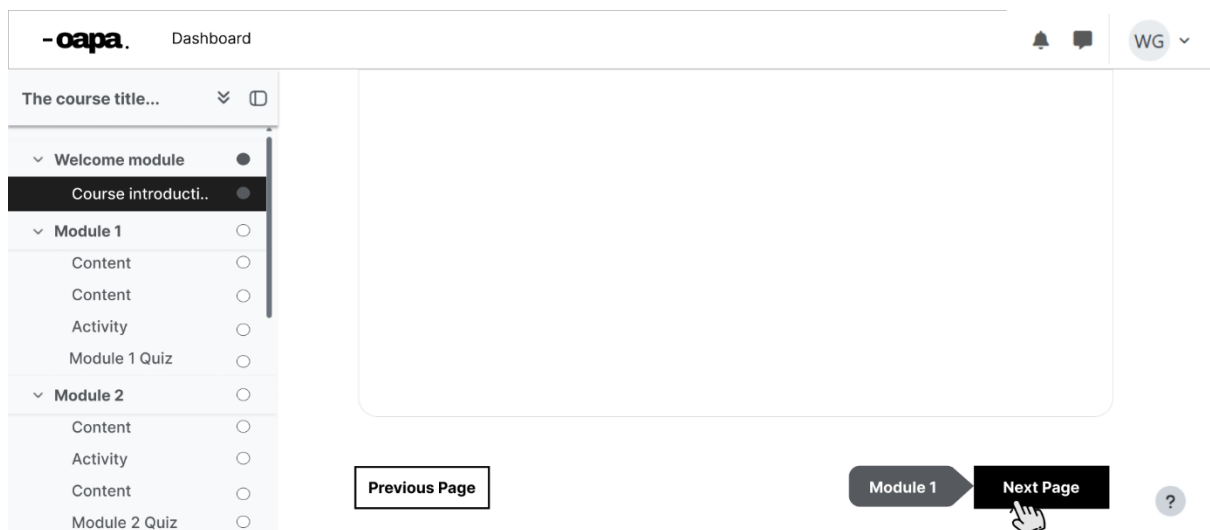

Progress indicators: progress indicators are initially a circle with dark grey lining and filled with white in the middle. They are placed on the right side of every tab in the left navigation panel. How they work is when the user completes reviewing the module content, that content tab turns dark grey indicating completion. The same goes for activity and quiz. Once all the tabs for the module are complete, then sets the module to complete.

Theme and logo: the top logo was modified to suit the OAPA branding. When the user is in a tab in the modules, this is visible through the tab changing colour to black. This suits the clients' requirements where the theme is black and white.

Course End of Page

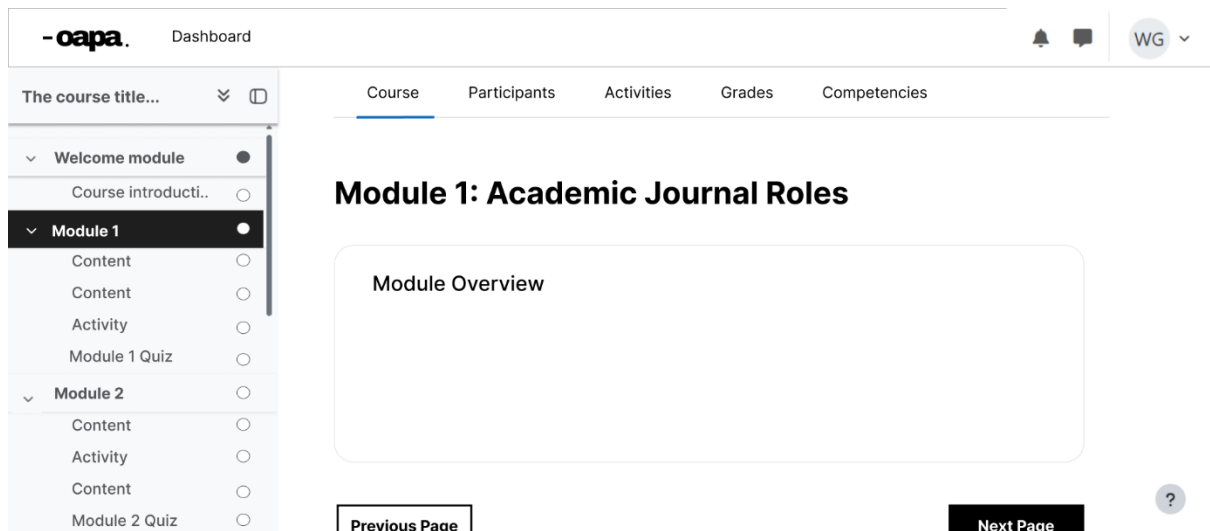

When the user reaches the end of the page two extra navigation buttons were added:

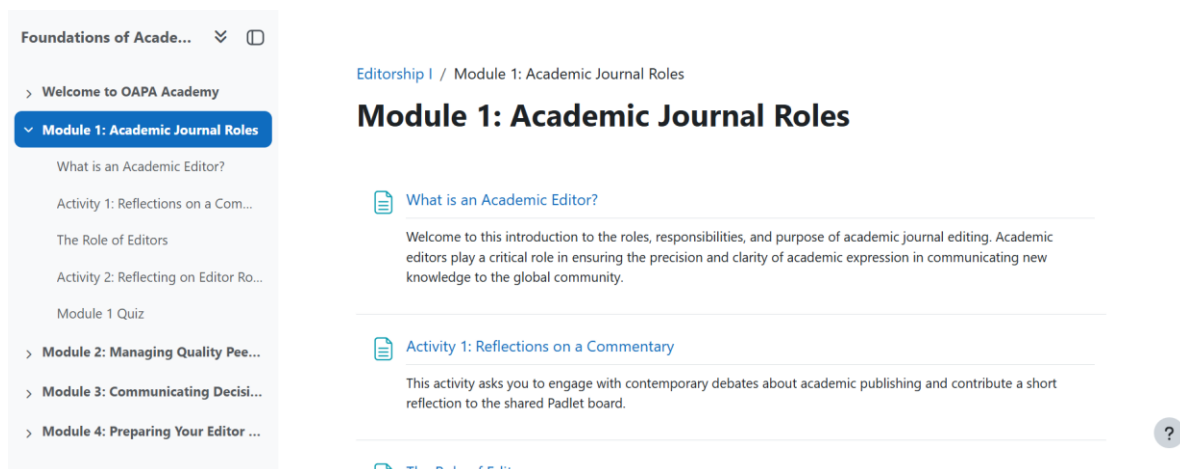

- Previous page
- Next page

When the user hovers over the buttons, the system lets them know the title of the page that is either after or before the one they are in.

Introduction page for each module

The current platform does not have an introduction page so when the user clicks on module 1 it takes them to another navigation method in the main content area as shown in the image below:

Therefore, in order to eliminate the redundant navigation in the module page, I have introduced a module introduction landing page.
