

Participants tab UX changes

Rationale behind the design change

There are several design issues with the current OAPA Academy Participants tab. Some of the noticeable issues:

1. Lack of role-based access control

The user and course facilitator have the same access control. Where they can view when the other users are active on the site, they both can also download user information in various formats. This is critical as it creates a lack of distinction between the roles and may lead to privacy concerns. This is the current look of the tab:

The solution to this is to have two instances of the participant's tab; one for the user and one for the course facilitators. The user will only be able to see the participants and their roles. While the course facilitators can see when the users accessed the course as well as generate a table report.

2. Messy redundant tabs and tab options

The screenshot displays a filter configuration interface. At the top, it says "Match All of the following:". Below this, there are two filter conditions stacked vertically, separated by an "AND" operator. Each condition consists of a "Match" dropdown menu and a "Select" input field. The first condition's "Match" dropdown is open, showing three options: "Any", "None", and "All". The "Any" option is currently selected and highlighted in blue. The second condition's "Match" dropdown is also open, showing the same three options: "Any", "None", and "All". At the bottom of the interface, there is a "+ Add condition" button, a "Clear filters" button, and an "Apply filters" button.

The tabs are redundant where some options include None, Any and All. Instead, the solution is to remove it completely and to have a search tab where the user can search participants. Another addition next to the search tab is the drop-down tab where the user can sort the participants by alphabetical order.
